

world ...

Different cultures have different opinions

Not all cultures see the world with the same eyes. They have different priorities, different values, and perceive ~~the same~~ things from different angles. When looking at the globalization of our society, opening up our personal opinions to be conscious of how other societies form a 'norm', is becoming increasingly important. If the majority of people in a foreign country is doing something in a specific manner, it's ~~probable~~ that their culture and society have taught them to do so.

Learning about ~~That makes the meeting of~~ different cultures ~~is such~~ a good opportunity to see the world from another point of view. It's also a wonderful tool to identify and question ~~your own culture-based opinions~~. We realize that what we see as normal isn't normal in other parts of the world. This gives ~~you us~~ the possibility to "try out" different angles. ~~and see what works best for us~~.

I always loved to explore other cultures, exchange world views, and learn from them. ~~But Due to the pandemic, being in touch with other people and yet~~ other cultures is pretty impossible ~~at the moment~~. So from the comfort of my living room, I went to discover the depths of Netflix - and sure enough I found a series that offered quite a handful of cultural clashes: Emily in Paris. Don't worry, you don't have to see the show to know what I am talking about, nor will I ~~create a spoiler~~. ↵

But, ~~I want to share with you the scene that made me question (and rethink) my whole (cultural-based?) opinions~~ on sexism.

Sexy or sexist?

To give you some context first: The show stars a young woman called Emily who moves from the States to Paris to work in a French marketing company. Due to the different cultures, there are various occasions in which the American marketing executive's

Yvette Putter
9:42 AM Yesterday

Replace: "That's" with "This is"

Yvette Putter
9:42 AM Yesterday

Replace: "the exact" with "equated to the"

Yvette Putter
9:43 AM Yesterday

Add: "Culture teaches us to associate certain feelings to certain concepts, and with sexism those connotat..."

Yvette Putter
9:44 AM Yesterday

Delete: "It's"

Yvette Putter
9:44 AM Yesterday

Delete: "At least, that's what our culture taught us and therefore these emotions are our automatic response ..."